Autumn SPECIALTIES

Johnson's Favorite, a Phlox of vivid hue which produces fine trusses of bloom and stands up well in wind and rain

IT IS pleasant to dig in the warm, dry earth of autumn. It is also the best time to plant most flowers for next year's garden. They get a chance to make new roots and to develop strong crowns for next year's flowering. A few leaves or boughs are all the protection needed.

Hardy Flowers for Next Summer's Garden

Trollius europaeus

OUR nurseries now are full of vigorous plants which ought to be blooming in the gardens of our friends next summer. To do their best they should be planted this autumn in the places where they are to flower.

In spring, the season may be late, the ground wet, or other matters may interfere; and if, after much delay, the plants do get into the ground, they have only a few short weeks to catch their breath, dig in, grow up, and bloom.

Let's give them a fairer chance. Plant them now. Let their roots burrow deeply into the warm and comfortable autumn soil foraging for the food upon which the crowns may fatten and grow sturdy, ready to break forth lustily and happily at the call of spring. Here is a group of plants selected to make a well-balanced garden. Choose them in lots of three or five of a kind at the prices indicated; or, better still, let us supply the complete garden of three or five each, according to the space available.

HARDY PHLOX

When the high tide of June is past, and summer starts to ebb, the main reliance of the gardener who wants flowers and brilliant color in the garden is placed in Hardy Phlox. Through the difficult season of heat and drought, Phloxes maintain the glory of the garden and fill the evening air with fragrance.
